THE EAGLES: “Hotel California”

The making of a studio masterpiece.

BY PAUL ROBINSON

THIS TITLE CUT from the Eagles' Grammy-winning "1977 Record of the Year" was originally conceived by guitarist Don Felder, who then presented his initial sketches to the rest of the band for refinement. Don Henley and Glen Frey applied their lyrical talents to the music; Joe Walsh's contribution was mainly in the areas of production and arrangement, with such classic Walshian touches as the background "chick-a" track (Gtr.3) and the octave-doubled bass figure (Gtr.4), beginning with the first verse (see rehearsal letter C).

The opening eight bars feature Felder playing a Takamine acoustic 12-string guitar recorded with both a microphone and an internal pickup. The microphone's signal was sent directly into the mixing board, while the pickup's signal was sent through a Leslie (rotating speaker) that was placed between two additional microphones.

Felder used a capo for this part, clamping it down behind the 7th fret (between the 6th and 7th frets). This enabled him to play the arpeggiated chords as clearly and effortlessly as if they were in the open position. For example, to play the first chord (Bm) without the capo, he would have had to barre his index finger behind the 7th fret (an almost unreasonable request on a 12-string!). With the capo, he was able to finger it like an ordinary open E minor chord. The six-string acoustic guitar (Gtr. 2) that enters at rehearsal letter B is a Martin D-35.

The classic lead guitar finale, beginning at rehearsal letter K, features Felder and Walsh trading licks and eventually teaming up for a climactic harmonized duet. Notice the distinctly different, yet complementary, tones of the two guitars (Felder uses a Gibson Les Paul; Walsh plays a Fender Telecaster through a phase shifter).

And so at last, here are all the guitar tracks recorded on "Hotel California." Thanks to Don Felder for his consultation.
